In order to compare effects on human mononuclear leukocytes in vitro and in vivo, lymphocytes from two groups of patients were irradiated in vitro and then the lymphocytes were returned to the patients intravenously. Circulating lymphocytes, subsequently in vivo irradiated were compared with nonirradiated controls with respect to numbers, B-lymphocyte transformation, and two types of cytopenic patients. Irradiated lymphocytes from these patients were as effective as nonirradiated lymphocytes in in vivo stimulation of normal and cytopenic lymphocytes. However, a significant excess of T cells was found in the circulation of these patients. Although T cell-dependent B-cell responses were impaired, their numbers were sufficient in several patients for B-cell stimulation and enhancement of in vivo B-cell responses. Only in some patients was the in vitro effect of gamma irradiation on blast transformation equivalent to the in vivo effect and the difference between absolute numbers of circulating T cells did not correlate with B-cell function. These results indicate that T-cell-dependent B-cell responses to soluble antigens are adequate in patients with reduced T-cell function and that in vitro blast transformation tests are a sensitive means of assessing B-cell function.Oral high-carbohydrate diet increases plasma uric acid, insulin, and glucose.
